The Ledges Trail at the Simone Preserve ends at the boundary with the White Mountain National Forest. No trails extend onto National Forest property. At the trail's terminus you'll notice that the ledges, cliff, and talus continue up the steep south face of Spruce Mountain. These steep slopes and exposed ledges create a "colluvial" environment where nutrients have accumulated along a downward-sloping gradient, creating deep loams capable of sustaining rich woods, an important wildlife habitat that hosts a number of rare plants.
